1 Introduction

Software certification demonstrates the reliability and safety of software systems in such a way that it can be understood by the developer and the customer. It builds on existing software assurance, validation, and verification techniques but introduces the notion of certification which is a formal process of demonstrating the quality of the system through an independent assessment of the demonstrated properties. A software certificate management system (SCMS) is a system that supports the creation and maintenance of certificates for different system artifacts (e.g., design documents, engineering data sets, or programs) and different varieties of certificates, checks the validity of certificates, provides access to the certificates, and supports the generation of certificates for use in the system-wide certification and release policies.

SCMSs are systems that support for automated re-certification of diverse artifacts should become an essential part of any effective development process. They should be used to support the certification of the system as a whole by providing automation support for their assets. A SCMS can at any time provide current information about the certification status of each component in the system, check system requirements, and verify that the system satisfies them. A SCMS can also support system modifications, and automatically start an incremental re-certification.

SCMSs can be used to support the certification of the system as a whole with automated code generation and formal verification methods. Here, our focus is on the important question of how code generators can support the certification process, as how software certification can be used to demonstrate and increase the reliability of the code

2 Challenges

Building reliable software is a challenging task in itself, but there are several challenges specifically related to certification, e.g.,

- maintaining high reliability, especially when a combination of diverse development techniques is used.
